CONTENTS

Preface page xiii

Introduction 1

PART I The quest for objectivity: the method and construction of universal law 13

1 Method and construction of international law in nineteenth-century German scholarship 15

A Kaltenborn and the “objective principle” of international law 15
   I The “subjective principle” in Kant and Hegel 17
   II Humanity as a “community of law” [Rechtsgemeinwesen] in Kaltenborn 18

B Bergbohm and Fricker: “The problem of international law revisited” 21

C Jellinek as synthesis 26
   I The free will of the state as the formal ground of all law 28
   II The concept of “self-obligation” [Selbstverpflichtung] and the obligatory nature of public law 30
   III The theory of the guaranteed norm 32
   IV Jellinek’s “objective international law” 32
      1 The “nature of the thing” [Natur der Sache] as a principle of objectification 32
      2 “Shared interests” and “purpose of the state” as the final sociological foundation of objective international law 35

D Heinrich Triepel and the “common will” [Gemeinwille] as a principle of objectivization 38

Conclusion 42
2  Kelsenian formalism as critical methodology in international law  44

A  A new methodological tool kit  44
   I  Methodological dualism as the starting point  45
   II  Methodological critique through the “identity thesis”  50
   III  The anti-ideological thrust of the new methodology  54

B  The function of the critical methodology: law as a universal medium for shaping society  56
   I  Volks, nation, and state in international law  56
   II  Law as a universal medium of societal change  60

C  The fundamental critique of the conceptual apparatus of international law  61
   I  The conceptual uncoupling of the notion of sovereignty from the “state as a legal person of will” [willensfähige Staatsperson]  61
      1  Critique of the conception of sovereignty as a core stock of state competencies  63
      2  Sovereignty as a hierarchy-creating, ordering element of the legal system  64
   II  The critique of the doctrine of self-obligation  67
   III  The critique of a dualism of state law and international law  70
      1  A critique of the duality of sources  70
      2  A critique of the duality of regulatory objects  71

D  The opponents of the critical method: Kelsen’s abstract conceptual world as a “radical-logicistic metaphysics”  73

3  An “objective” architecture of international law: Kelsen, Kunz, and Verdross  78

A  Constructing a unitary system  78
   I  Systemic unity as an epistemological postulate  79
   II  “Delegation” as a unity-creating structural principle  80
   III  The idea of unity in the discourse on international law  82
B International law as law endowed with the power of coercion 84
   I Central compulsion and the “world state trap” [Weltstaatsfalle] 84
   II Reprisals and war as decentralized means of coercion 87
   III The coercive character as an evolutionary achievement 90

C The primacy thesis: the construction of an international law above the state 93
   I The delimitation of the state’s spheres of competence through international law 93
   II The primacy thesis and the problem of norm conflicts 96
   III The defense and further development of the primacy thesis 97
   IV The primacy thesis, domestic jurisdiction, and the decisions of the Permanent Court of International Justice (PCIJ) 100

D The quarrel over the choice hypothesis [Wahlhypothese] 104

E The opponents of the construction of a universal law and the notion of the “world state” 108
   I Universal law, the “world state,” and the civitas maxima 108
   II The universal system of law as natural law? 112
   III The abuse of the idea of universalism 116

PART II The outlines of the cosmopolitan project – the actors, sources, and courts of universal law 119

4 The new actors of universal law 123

A Legally organized communities above the state 125
   I Unions of states as a dynamic continuum of legal integration 126
      1 Unions of states as a particular international legal community 127
      2 The doctrine of centralization and decentralization 130
      3 Sovereignty as the state’s direct subordination to international law [Völkerrechtsunmittelbarkeit] 132
   II The legal nature of the League of Nations 133
      1 The League of Nations as a personified sub-order of international law 136
      2 The League of Nations as a community of joint ownership [Gemeinschaft zur gesamten Hand] 140
   III The opponents of an “integration-friendly” theory of international law 143
B The individual 146
   I Positive law 146
   II The critique of Scelle and Politis 148

C Universal law as a dynamic system of integration 150

5 Legal sources as universal instruments of law-creation 153
   A Sources beyond metaphysics and consensus 153
      I The critique of metaphysical dualism 154
      II The critique of the positivist consensus model 157
      III The hypothetical character of international law: the basic norm of international law 160
   B The legal sources of international law and the hierarchical structure of the law 165
      I Customary law 167
         1 Dispensing with the opinio iuris 168
         2 The replacement for the opinio iuris 170
      II An objective doctrine of treaties 172
         1 The creation of the treaty-based legal order 173
         2 The international treaty's mode of action 176
   C The theory of legal sources as a self-limitation of legal scholarship 179
   D The opponents of a “dematerialized” doctrine of legal sources 181
      I Rematerialization as a strategy of revision 181
      II Pure Theory of Law and the “unjust” status quo 185
      III Replacing the ideal of justice with the ideal of peace 188

6 The international judiciary as the functional center of universal law 191
   A Peace through compulsory jurisdiction 191
      I The politico-legal approach: the Permanent League for the Maintenance of Peace 193
      II The socio-historical approach: compulsory jurisdiction as a necessary step toward a centralized, universal legal system 198
      III The doctrinal approach: the fundamental critique of the doctrinal limitation on the judicial function in international relations 203
CONTENTS

B The theoretical classification of the judicial decision 212
   I The function of the judicial decision within the hierarchical structure of the law 212
   II The nature of judicial decision-making 214
   III The postulate of compulsory jurisdiction as the consequence of a system-oriented conception of the law 218

C Realist opposition to the quest for a strong international judiciary: compulsory jurisdiction as another “distinguished international lawyer’s dream” 220

7 The role of the international legal scholar after Kelsen - a concluding reflection 225

Postscript - on Kelsenian formalism in international law (2010) 233

Career sketches: Hans Kelsen, Alfred Verdross, and Josef Laurenz Kunz 272

Bibliography 286

Index 316