Contents

Foreword vii

1 Philosophical Myths and Models 1
   Dissatisfaction at the highest level 1 – The accusation of ‘myth’ in philosophy 4 – Model-making philosophy, a contradictio in adjecto 7 – The myth of the given 16 – From the myth of the given to the myth of the mediate 21 – Interpretationism and the philosophy of perception 23 – Transcendental interpretationism 27 – The link between the myth of the given and the myth of the mediate: Representationism 34 – The paradigm of access 37

2 Phenomenology: Philosophy without a Model 43
   Phenomenal certainty 43 – From Cartesian Cartesianism to phenomenological Cartesianism 45 – Intentionality: The fundamentum inconcussum relationalis 50 – To the things themselves and back to language 57 – Phenomenological protrepsis 60 – Eidetic variation 64

3 The Me of Perception 69
   From conditions of possibility to consequences of reality 69 – From the primacy of the perceiver to the primacy of perception 72 – From the I to the Me of perception 75 – The imposition of continuing presence 78 – Describing the imposition of presence: The content of perception 81 – The quality of perception and the moment of apperception 83 – Being certain that something is the case: Knowledge and certainty 86 – The impossible epoche 90 – From impression to expression to taking part 95 – Transcendental aesthetics and the assumption of forms of intuition 102 – The embodiment of the perceiver: A consequence of perception 105
- The continuity of the perceived 111 – The perceived and the cause of perception 116 – The imposition of a presence in public 120 – The identity of me 124

4 The Pause in Participation
Pause versus interruption 131 – The three paradigms of the theory of image perception 133 – The unique object of image perception 134 – The unique origin of image perception 137 – The unique consequences of image perception 140 – Forced into spectatorship 145 – Optical de-individualization of the Me 147 – Deciding to take part 150

Bibliography 155
Index 161