Contents

Acknowledgements ................................................................................... IX

Foreword ................................................................................................. XI

By Astrid Franke

1. Introduction ........................................................................................ 1

2. Theorizing the Consumer .................................................................... 7
   2.1 A Theoretical Outline of Alternative Consumption ...................... 7
      2.1.1 ‘Ordinary’ and Alternative Consumption ............................. 9
      2.1.2 Consumer Reflexivity and Decision-Making ....................... 14
   2.2 The Myth of the Passive Consumer – The Consumer as Social Actor ......................................................... 16
      2.2.1 The Private-Public-Dichotomy – Consumption and Political Action .................................................................. 16
      2.2.2 The Relationship between the Individual and Consumer Society ................................................................ 18
      2.2.3 The “Currency Model” ....................................................... 27
   2.3 Distinction, Cultural Capital, and Alternative Consumption .......... 30
      2.3.1 Keeping up with the Joneses, or Sticking out from the Crowd? ..................................................................... 31
      2.3.2 On the Importance of Consumer Goods ............................. 36
      2.3.3 The Dynamics of Distinction and Alternative
           Consumption ..................................................................... 39
   2.4 A Question of Choice ...................................................................... 44

3. Politicizing the Consumer in America .............................................. 49
   3.1 The Historic Roots of Political Consumerism ............................... 49
      3.1.1 From the Revolution to the Rise of Fordism ....................... 49
      3.1.2 Consumer Politics during the Depression and World War II .................................................................... 54
   3.2 From Post-World War II Era to the Rise of Postmodernism .......... 58
      3.2.1 Post-War Affluence and the Emerging Opposition to Materialism ................................................................... 58
      3.2.2 The 1960s and the End of Mass Culture ......................... 67
      3.2.3 Consumption and Postmodernism .................................... 72
   3.3 Lifestyles and Consumption ......................................................... 83