Table of Contents

Acknowledgements

General Introduction

Statement of the Problem and Hypotheses

Definition of Terms

Chapter 1

Understanding Canaan Sodindo Banana:

- The Man and the Ideals

Introduction

- Canaan Sodindo Banana: The man
- Canaan Sodindo Banana: The Ideals
- African Culture/Religion as the foundation for African Christianity
- African Experience as the basis for Theologizing
- The Politics or Theology of compromise as opposed to true liberation
- The Politics and Theology of Land as a threat to Africanness
- Socialism as essentially Christian, Christianity is Socialism
- Justice, Equality and Fairness: The trilogy of revolutionary (true) Christianity
- Signs of Frustration and Betrayal
- Concluding Observations

Chapter 2

“Rewriting the Bible” in “The Case for a New Bible”: Analysis and Issues

Introduction

- The Problem behind the Call to Rewrite the Bible
- The Nature of the Bible
- Defining re-writing as understood by Banana
- The importance of re-writing the Bible
- The Impossibility of Re-writing the Bible: A critique
- Concluding observations
CHAPTER 3

IS DE-BIBLIFICATION A VIABLE ALTERNATIVE TO “RE-WRITING” THE BIBLE? ................................................. 83
Introduction ......................................................................................................................................................... 83
The Public Sphere: definition and delimitation .......................................................... 84
The Bible in the Public Sphere: A Masking Tape? ......................................................... 91
De-biblification of the public sphere:
  An antidote to the Masking Tape? ................................................................................ 107
Critique of total De-biblification of the Public Sphere .................................................. 110
Proposing a
  Partial De-Biblification of the Public Sphere in Zimbabwe ........................................ 114
Concluding Observations ................................................................................................. 117

CHAPTER 4

IS A “CRITICAL BIBLIFICATION” OF THE PUBLIC SPHERE A VIABLE OPTION? ........................................... 121
Introduction ......................................................................................................................................................... 121
“Critical biblification”: Rationale and Definition ........................................................ 124
The Goals of a “Critical biblification” of the Public Sphere ........................................ 127
On Christians and Bible scholars: Building New Bridges........................................... 132
Concluding Remarks ................................................................................................................. 138

CHAPTER 5

GENERAL CONCLUSIONS .......................................................................................................................... 141
Introduction ......................................................................................................................................................... 141
The Bible as a continuing, relevant Influence .............................................................. 143
Scope for Biblical Studies ................................................................................................. 155
Conclusion ......................................................................................................................................................... 176

REFERENCES .................................................................................................................................................. 179