the forms found in the manuscripts sometimes has its own inconveniences: the form ḫǝllinā (§ 14, reading of the Berlin manuscript, accepted in the edition and defended with good reasons as a Copticism on p. 106, as against ḫǝllǝnā: found in the EMML manuscript) cannot be accepted, because ḫǝllinā is simply a non-grammatical form; the expected form would be ḫǝllinā (a clear case of lectio media or ‘diffraction’) and the editor should at least have added a comment and at best emended the reading.

Presented in Ugo Zanetti’s usual competent, fresh, participatory, and humble tone, this admirable new volume is actually a valuable and very welcome contribution to Egyptian (Copto-Arabic) and Ethiopian hagiography.

In this publication, Gérard Colin presents his edition of the Ethiopic text of the Gädl and Täʾammor (miracles) of Samuʾel of Waldǝbba, along with his French translation. The edition, divided into 341 numbered paragraphs, is structured into two main parts: the Gädl (§§ 1–184) and seventy miracles (§§ 185–338), followed by a final prayer (§ 339) and concluding exhortations (§§ 340–341). The work also includes a brief Introduction (pp. 1–5) in which the author, after a concise presentation of Samuʾel’s life, gives consideration to the motives of his spiritual ‘success’. He then mentions the two recensions of the Gädl, identifying the manuscripts that contain them and providing other detailed information. Samuʾel is one of the most famous monks and saints of the Ethiopian Orthodox Church, who lived in the fourteenth/fifteenth century. Usually known as Samuʾel of Waldǝbba, in this Gädl (§ 183) and especially in the miracles (§§ 227, 239, and 314), Samuʾel is referred to several times as ‘Samuʾel of the desert of Wali (Gâdamā Wâlī), the latter

(see A. Bausi and A. Camplani, ‘The History of the Episcopate of Alexandria (HEpA): Editio minor of the fragments preserved in the Aksumite Collection and in the Codex Veronensis LX (58)’, Adamantius, 22 (2016, pub. 2017), 249–302), the form ḫǝllinā is completely absent and only ḫǝllinā (over forty occurrences) appears, alternating with ḫǝllinā (thirteen occurrences).

According to the narration of the Gādlä Samuʾel (henceforth GS) edited by Colin, Samuʾel is born in Aksum to his father Ǝstifanos and his mother ʿAmätä Maryam, both natives of the region of Şora. He enters the ‘monastery of Abba Adḥani, which is Bänk”ål’ (§ 26),\footnote{In our text it is said that Samuʾel receives the monastic habit from Abba Adḥani. In the GS edited by Turaiev, instead, Samuʾel receives it from Mädḫaninä Ǝgzi’ (cf. pp. 2–3 of Turaiev’s edition). On this difference between the two editions, cf. also ‘Samuʾel of Waldǝbba’, cit., in particular p. 517b. The same is found in the Gādlä Mädḥaninä Ǝgzi, cf. G. Colin, Vie et Miracles de Madhanina Egzi’, Patrologia Orientalis, 51/4 (229) (Turnhout: Brepols, 2010), passim. Colin states that, in the GS, Abba Adḥani is the name with which Mädḥaninä Ǝgzi’ ‘is generally called’ (p. 1). About a certain Adḥani, Ethiopian monk and saint of the fourteenth century, cf. O. Raineri, ‘Adḥāni’, in J. Nadal Cañellas, S. Virgulin, and G. Guaita, Enciclopedia dei Santi. Le Chiese Orientali, I: A–Gio, Bibliotheca sanctorum orientalium (Roma: Città Nuova, 1998), 57; see also ‘Adḥani’, EAe, I (2003), 95a–b (S. Kaplan).} and receives the monastic habit from Abba Adḥani.\footnote{The reference is to the monastery of Däbrä Bänk”ål, located in the region of Şire, in West Taγray (p. 27, n. 10).} His father (as earlier his mother) also becomes a monk. Together they go to dwell in solitude in a nearby place. Then, they move to Wäyna, greeted by the monks of the place, with Samuʾel fleeing several times into the desert. After seventeen years at Wäyna, Samuʾel retires to more deserted places, feeding on tree roots and wild herbs. Afterwards, he welcomes his first two disciples: Zärufaʾel, the oldest of all his disciples (but at that time very young), and Niqodimos ‘son of his teacher’ (§ 48).\footnote{According to Colin, Niqodimos’ teacher was Mädḥaninä Ǝgzi’ (p. 45, n. 16).} With them, he stays for a while in a cave, and later in a large cavern. Furthermore, Samuʾel digs a deep pit only for himself and he lives in it for... three months, in strict fasting and persistent prayer. Again, he moves to Wǝdaka and then to Wali, ‘his desert’ (§ 116). Before he dies, Samuʾel tells of his heavenly vision to his disciples: led to the divine throne, Jesus gives him the kidan and tells him that his departure is near. Samuʾel dies when he is one hundred years old, on 12 Taḥśaš.

Numerous characters, religious or not, are mentioned in the GS. Many prodigious interventions, as predictions, healings, and exorcisms, are attributed to Samuʾel. The Gädl also emphasizes his familiarity with wild animals—with lions above all, but also with leopards and elephants, although there are also foxes, hyenas, buffaloes, wild boars, and snakes—which he heals and makes harmless. They bow down before him and obey him as servants. Friendship with animals—a theme also found widely in Western Christian hagiography—is a feature that he shares with other Ethiopian saints. As Colin says, Samuʾel and Gābrä Mānfas Qaddus are ‘the two most famous “wild animals’ friends” of Ethiopia’ (p. 3, n. 4).

According to him, the influence of Samuʾel was due to this ‘symbiosis’ with wild animals, but also ‘to his clear spiritual direction and to his role as exegete of sacred texts’ (p. 3); also important was the rigour of his ascetic life (p. 3). Among the practices with which he mortified and weakened his body were deprivation of sleep and food, abstention from speaking, statio, isolation, flagellation, and wearing a cilice.

The seventy miracles (numbered in the Ethiopic text), of which some of the motifs mentioned in the Gädl are found, also emphasize the miraculous power of the dust of Samuʾel’s tomb, as well as of his commemoration: those who do it reluctantly are punished, whereas those who perform it in faith are rewarded.

In the Introduction (p. 4), the editor refers to the presence of both a short and a long recension of the GS. The relationship between the two is difficult to determine, he says, meaning whether they both depend on an earlier and lost version or whether one depends on the other. The elements related to the life of the saint remain, however, almost identical.

Representative of the short version is MS Paris, Bibliothèque nationale de France (= BnF), Éthiop. 136 (GS: fols 45r–95r), the only witness to this recension so far known in Europe. In a footnote (p. 1, n. 1), and without additional details, Colin indicates the official shelf mark of this manuscript and the catalogue identifying it. It is a composite manuscript from the fifteenth century, which also contains a rare and rather short version of the acts of Abunä Täklä Haymanot (fols 1r–44r), defined by the editor Conti Rossini as a witness of the ‘Waldabba recension’. Turaiev based his edition of the Gāḍlā Samu’el (1902) on this one manuscript, and did not provide a translation. The codices containing the long version of the GS (p. 4) are MS BnF Éthiop. d’Abbadie 32 (GS: fols 5r–93v) and MS BnF Éthiop. d’Abbadie 61 (GS: fols 1r–99r) from the fifteenth century. To these, Colin adds MS Vatican City, Biblioteca Apostolica Vaticana, Cerulli, Cerulli et. 198 (GS: fols 3r–47r) of the eighteenth century. This latter however, like d’Abbadie 32, was not used for his edition. Colin says, without giving any explanation, that the two manuscripts can be ‘ignored for the arrangement of the text’ (p. 4). Older, and therefore considered by him more worthy of interest, is BnF Éthiop. d’Abbadie 61 (MS B in the edition).

The seventy miracles that immediately follow the Gāḍl extend the long recensio of the GS. One witness of this version, on which Colin bases his editio (MS A), is a codex preserved in the monastery of Dābrā Abbay. According to the description which he provides (p. 5), this codex contains 178 written folia and presents lacunae, both in the Gāḍl and in the miracles, as well as several transposed leaves. Paleographic examination and the intercession to King Na’od (1494–1508), found at the explicit of miracle 64 (§ 327), suggest that the manuscript was completed in the late fifteenth or early sixteenth century.

Another witness of the long version of the GS, or more precisely, as the editor states, ‘of an abbreviated version of the long recension’ (p. 4), and 8 Colin does not specify in which folia the lacunae are located or which are the transposed folia. The information about the lacunae is, however, easily deducible thanks to the indication, given on the left side of the text in Gǝ’ez, of the folia’s number in MS A, which is replaced, in the case of lacunae, by that of MS B.

which also contains the miracles of the saint, is MS Berlin, Staatsbibliothek zu Berlin Preußischer Kulturbesitz, Orientabteilung, orient. oct. 1303 (GS: fols 3ra–46ra), dating back to the nineteenth century. Colin did not consider it for his edition. In the Introduction, he indicates this manuscript in a footnote (p. 4, n. 8), with the catalogue number (75) and not with the official shelf mark. The miracles (fols 46rb–76rb) are numbered from 39 to 70: according to him an ‘accident of transmission’ (p. 4) deprived this manuscript of the first thirty-eight miracles.

In his conclusion concerning the literary sources on Samuʾel, Colin gives a short indication (p. 5, n. 10) about another edition of the GS, namely the work titled የጋድል ለለምለ የሳምኤል በግእዝና በአማርኛ፤ተርጓሚ መሪጌታዊ ይዘርይሁን። published in 1996 EC (2003/2004 CE) by Mərigeta Ṣege Zāryəhun, with the Gǝʿǝz text and a translation in Amharic. In addition to the manuscripts mentioned in the book under review, I briefly signal here the existence of one more codex containing the Gädľ of Samuʾel followed by fifty-five miracles. It is an eighteenth/nineteenth-century manuscript from the monastery of Gundā Gunde (East Tǝgray) and digitalized by the Gunda Gunde Manuscript Project.9

For the edition of the GS, Colin adopted the editorial criterion of the base manuscript: between the two manuscripts fully collated, A and B, he chose the readings and the orthography of the first, considering it to be superior (p. 5). MS B, of which the unused readings are shown in the apparatus below the Gǝʿǝz text, is however important for those parts of the text where MS A has lacunae due to material damage or long omissions; here the text of MS A is replaced by the text of MS B. In the case of obvious errors in A, the editor accepts the readings of B, and where errors are found in both codices, he presents the readings as emended by himself.

For the edition of the text of the miracles, Colin only used MS A (see p. 159, n. 80). The lacuna at the beginning of the MS (§ 185) leaves this text without its incipit.

I wish to emphasize the outstanding effort that Colin has made in translating this extremely long text, which is a valuable contribution to our knowledge of this Gädľ and to the complete cycle of Samuʾel’s miracles. His numerous references to biblical quotations and to Ethiopian literary texts are highly appreciated, as well as his indications of linguistic forms not found in the dictionaries, and of uncertain translations. Furthermore, his decision to include relevant French titles in this edition is a great help in understanding the text; they make the reading easier, especially of the miracles. However, more details in the Introduction about the available manuscripts concerning Samu’el, those used in the edition and those not, would surely have enriched this precious work, along with more commentary on the edition itself, at least on the most significant textual readings and corrections. It would also have been useful to have some more indications as to the editorial criteria adopted and about the apparatus.

The volume under review stems from the author’s PhD Dissertation, submitted in 2011 at Addis Ababa University with the title Dǝrsanä Ṣǝyon: Philological Inquiries, Critical Edition and Annotated Translation and prepared under the supervision of Prof. Paolo Marrassini and Prof. Baye Yiman. The dissertation is the first product of the recently launched philology programme at Addis Ababa University, and this initiative, strongly promoted by the late Paolo Marrassini, is a new landmark in the progress of Ethiopian studies.

The work offers a wide-ranging investigation into Dǝrsanä Ṣǝyon (= hereafter DṢ) or the ‘Homily on [the glory] of Zion’. The same author has already made other contributions on this text,1 as well as on the related texts which constitute the corpus of literary pieces focusing on Zion. With this term, as the author meticulously illustrates, multiple meanings are intended: not only the Ark of the Covenant, widely glorified in the text, but also Mount Zion, as well as the Temple in the earthly Jerusalem, the new heavenly Jerusalem, the church of Aksum Ṣǝyon as the repository of the Ark, and, by extension, the entire Christian kingdom of Ethiopia. A metaphorical connection, attested elsewhere, is further established with the Holy Virgin, pivoting on the parallelism of Mary and the Temple as ‘wombs’ where God dwelt and making DṢ one
